About Pathways Beyond the Professoriate

In this competitive job market, it is important for students to have a better understanding of diverse career opportunities available to them once they leave Emory. Pathways Beyond the Professoriate connects students with distinguished alumni who discuss their career paths and the unique ways that they have used their Masters or PhD degrees to discover industries and identify positions that current students may never have considered.

Dr. Montoya is an interdisciplinary scholar of globalization and the factors that produce a global political economy. A Rhodes Scholar and Truman Scholar, he received a BA from the University of New Mexico, an MLitt from Oxford University, an MA from New York University, and his PhD from the Laney Graduate School at Emory University (ILA).

A native from Mora, New Mexico, he has returned to UNM because of his interest in New Mexico as a global emerging economy. He has taught a broad array of coursework from global culture and the history of economic thought to international management. His interdisciplinary training has positioned him to think critically about the circumstances that produce globalization and how nation-states interact with new global challenges.
